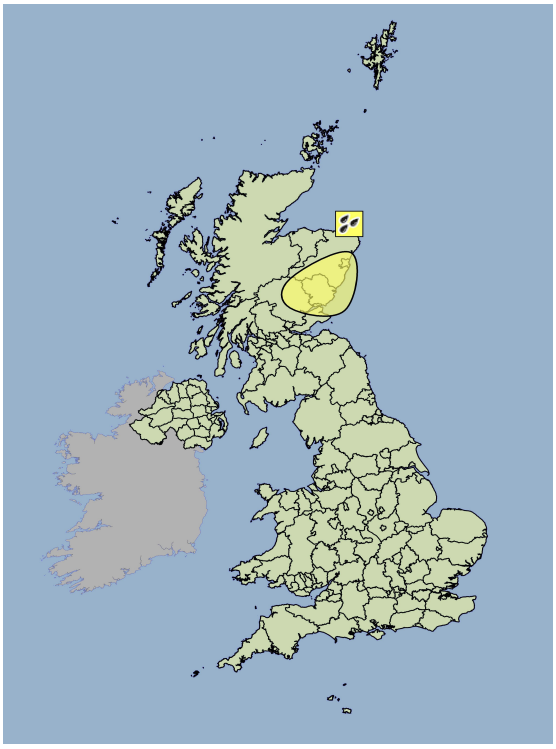
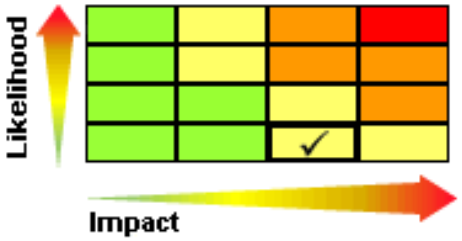
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
The frontal rain that has been falling across parts of Scotland through Friday will edge NE during Friday evening and then remain close to the NE of Scotland throughout the next 48 hours. Frontal waves are expected to develop along the front from time to time bringing rain back southwestwards into parts of eastern and northeastern Scotland. There is much uncertainty in both the timing and the depth of any wave development but current evidence suggests that a wave will run northwest across the far NE of Scotland later Saturday before clearing to the NW on Sunday morning. Some of the rain maybe heavy and in combination with the saturated ground it is likely to lead to some local surface and river flooding.

Given the uncertainty in the timing of this wave and the possibility of others it is possible that this alert will require updating.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Alert of Rain

Valid from 18:00 on Sat, 15th Nov 2014 until 09:00 on Sun, 16th Nov 2014

Rain, locally rather heavy at times, will spread southwestwards into eastern Scotland during Saturday afternoon and last into Sunday, coupled with strong easterly winds. This additional rainfall, following the recent wet weather, means that the public should be aware of an increased risk of surface water flooding and spray.

This is an update to the alert issued on Friday morning to bring the timings of the rainfall forwards.
